Gotcha. I think the whole "homework" thing is quite different for undergrad. We will certainly not "call her out" for not having the ungraded assignments ready for class discussion. To that end, she can have all of the time she wants to complete the assignments, but we will need to discuss the exercise on the day indicated on the syllabus.

I purposely omitted that homework thing. I think that's an impractical request, not just for the short-term constraints of the program, but also in the long-term of what/how she would manage her daily class assignments if she is able to make it to the fall semester. I think it's better to discourage her from that notion now so that it won't be an expectation later. If she insists upon it, I'm going to be forced to tell DK that I don't think she's being realistic about what will be expected of her and that perhaps law school is not the route for her.

Don,

I just noticed that Ms. Keith-Foust is supposed to receive two additional days for homework. What do we do about that? There is no real way that we can honor that request inasmuch as the program is on such a tight schedule. Also, I spoke with Ed today and he's checking with ExamSoft about whether the two programs that Ms. Keith-Foust uses can operate in an ExamSoft environment. It appears that we may have to bypass the block of other programs and allow her to access Word (to access the testing document) and ZoomText and/or JAWS during testing.

Sigh ...
