

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

November 13, 2009

Public service is a noble calling and a founding pillar of our Nation. Today, more than ever, we need individuals who will contribute their skill, talent, and passion to solve our most difficult problems. Since its establishment by President Lyndon Johnson in 1964, the White House Fellows Program has equipped emerging leaders with a depth of knowledge about governance and cultivated a lasting commitment to civic engagement.

Today's challenges cannot be met by government alone. In the 21st century, we will need new partnerships and creative leadership to succeed. Americans from all fields of study—including science, liberal arts, business, social entrepreneurship, military, non-profit, and law—will lead this charge.

Working alongside public servants at the highest levels of the Executive Branch, White House Fellows gain invaluable experience and can apply these lessons in any discipline or career. After their year in our Nation's capital, they leave with a broader perspective and renewed purpose to help their fellow citizens, to collaborate on the great challenges of their era, and to advance timeless American ideals.

As you embark on your life's journey, we hope you will consider applying to the White House Fellows Program and step into the current of history.

Michelle Obama

For more information, please visit www.whitehouse.gov/fellows.